Volume 29, Issue 3 August 2009

- Helping Bereaved Families for 27 Years

Sharing Parents is a Sacramento based non-profit organization devoted to supporting parents who have experienced the loss of a baby from the time of conception through early infancy.

Our Purpose is to provide a safe environment where grieving parents with similar experiences can come together and share their feelings about the loss and the love of their babies. Our meetings are also a place where parents express the love they had for their baby in their compassion for others, where they can give and receive emotional support by sharing common experiences and learn about the natural grief process while working through and resolving their loss.

We Offer a variety of meetings and support services that are designed to help parents throughout the different stages of their grief. There is never a fee to attend our meetings.

The First Anniversary

Written by Clara Hinton

The death of a young child is one of the most difficult pains to bear. Young children bring so much joy and wonderment into a home. They help a home to burst at the seams with enthusiasm and joy. When a young child dies, the entire family atmosphere is altered and never quite feels the same again.

Getting through the many “firsts” following the death of a young child is something that is not to be taken lightly. The first time going back to church. The first trip to visit the grandparents. The first family vacation. All of these moments are significant, and will bear heavy on the heart and soul of the grieving parent.

The most difficult day of all following the death of a young child is the first anniversary of the date the child died. Every detail of that day will come to mind, and most parents live in dread of this day for months. They grow more and more stressed and burdened as the anniversary date draws closer. There is an anticipation of heightened grief and pain as each day draws nearer.

With some careful thought and planning, the first anniversary of the death of a child can become a day that aids healing. The parents of the deceased child should sit down together and talk about what might bring the most help and encouragement into their lives on the anniversary day.

Some parents find it very healing to include a private memorial type of ceremony for close family members only. This can be used as a time for reading a favorite Scripture or poem, for sharing a special story about the child, or for reading a letter you have written to your child. Some even find it healing to share journal entries that have been written during the year.

Many parents have found it quite healing to visit the cemetery on the anniversary date and place special flowers and personal mementos at the gravesite. Some have also used this day to have a balloon or butterfly release. Butterflies can now be purchased online for such an occasion as remembering the first anniversary of the death of a child. The symbol of hope is most healing.

Some parents like music, and will spend endless hours choosing just the right words to fit the feelings of losing a child. Others have found it very healing to plant a tree, a living symbol of the love that continues on for their child. It will be very healing in years to come to watch the tree grow stronger and taller with each passing anniversary.

Many families have chosen this anniversary as a day to come together and work on a combined effort scrapbook of memories of the child who has died. Pictures, sayings, songs, favorite foods, and funny stories are all made as entries into the scrapbook, and this is an activity that can be continued on each anniversary date thereafter.

Whatever you choose to do, select something that will have personal meaning for you. Don't be afraid to be unique. Use this anniversary day as a time of letting go of some of the raw pain of grief. It has been a most difficult first year, and this day should be a time of remembering, but also of looking forward to some hope for the days ahead.

Most of all, use this anniversary day as a time to honor your child's life. When you have taken care to plan ahead, this day will be one of healing rather than of dread; peace rather than pain.

What do we do with his stuff?

By Stacey Hisey

When we made the announcement that my husband and I were pregnant, people started showering us with gifts immediately. Then we found out that he was a “he” and the first grandson, so we got even more gifts. We had three baby showers and, as always in my husband’s family went crazy and bought us almost everything off our registry.

My parents traveled from out of town to pick out (and pay for) the perfect baby furniture to give to their first grandson. We picked out the perfect crib, armoire, and changing table.

His room was completely decorated. His clothes had been laundered and folded and put away. His toys were placed in his toy wagon, waiting for him to play with them.

We were ready for this baby!!!!

So when our first son, Jack, passed away, we didn’t know how to answer the question, “What do we do with his stuff?”

Some people recommended getting rid of everything. They thought the idea of seeing a subsequent child in an outfit meant for our first son would continuously bring up bad memories.

Some people recommended passing everything down to our subsequent children, when/if that happened. One person said, “It’s all new anyway, Jack didn’t use it, so why waste it?”

My husband and I did a little of both. For the majority of the items, we decided to pass them down to our subsequent children. We had two more boys. The furniture went to my second son. And the clothes have been worn by both of my subsequent boys.

I put away a few of the personal items that I didn’t want to pass down. Such as the blanket that matched his bedding set. I started a “box” which is now the size of a large plastic tub, to have all “his stuff” that the boys aren’t allowed to have.

And I took back a few items. I couldn’t bear to pass down his nursery decorations or his bedding set. I picked that set out special for Jack. It took me a year after he passed to drum up the nerve to even think about parting with it. I thought that if I returned the bedding set, I would be letting go of him. Then I decided, after a year of debating with myself, that I should return the items and use the store credit to buy something for our next baby (I was already pregnant with my second boy). I thought that our first son would want this.

A week later, I went back to the store to buy stuff using the gift card we received. And I saw the items we returned in the “Clearance Section.” I immediately broke down. I saw the lamp that was supposed to be in my first baby’s room.

A week after that, I went back to the store, and saw the lamp again. It took about a month for the lamp to finally be purchased. At one point, I thought about buying the lamp back. I decided against it, because I realized that the lamp would not bring him back.

I realized that neither choice was easy.

When I put my second son to sleep in the crib that was meant for our first, I still think, “This should have been Jack’s furniture. I should be putting him down for a nap in it.”

When I put my third son in an outfit I bought for Jack, I wonder what he would have looked like in it.

What I found through this journey of losing our first son and having to make this decision of what to do with the stuff is that there isn’t a right or wrong answer. It’s a deeply personal choice and has to be made by the bereaved parents. The bereaved parents have to do what feels right to them.

This stuff won’t bring back my baby. Nor will the parting of it ease or lessen my pain. I’m afraid that the answer to this question is up to the parents. And neither choice is easy.
